Before 1880 the Inn was operated by James Hamm and known as “Hamm’s Hotel” although it’s official name was Frontenac Hotel before the present Frontenac Hotel opened. During the 80’s its name changed to Queen’s.

Before the hotel took over the premises of The Canadian Freeman printing company, the Freeman was stoned by a mob in 1887. William O’Brien had come to the city to hold meetings. His rivals who claimed he was attempting to revive the Fenianism of the 60’s blocked passage to the hall where he was to speak, singing “Rule Britannia”. Some members threw a stone at what is now the east section of the hotel. Others followed until every window was smashed.

It was rumored that the Ontario Hockey Association was formed at the Queen’s Hotel in Kingston but investigation proves the OHA was organized in Toronto at the Queen’s Hotel there.

Through the “dry years”, 1925-34, which spelled bad times for many hotels throughout the province, the Queen’s bar never closed! The legal 2.2 percent beer still dispensed.

Journeymen and craftsmen always patronized the Queen’s as a residential hotel. The characteristic of the old block house still remains.

The hotel originally had 24 rooms. Each room was equipped with a long rope that was bolted to the wall enabling one to shimmy down to the street in case of an emergency.

John A. MacDonald had his law office just a block away. He would stop by to chat with the proprietor and likely bought a few drinks for the patrons at election time.
